To Francis Coolidge
and his pony, Cranberry

Billy was a boy who had a pony with four white feet and a wide white stripe on his face. This is called a “blaze,” so Billy named his pony Blaze. Billy loved Blaze very much and took the best care of him.

They went for long rides through the woods. Some of the roads were forgotten and nobody ever used them. Billy loved to explore, and Blaze seemed to like it too. They saw many birds and rabbits and squirrels.

One day Billy and Blaze stopped by a little house. An old man sat out in the sun. He was very friendly and asked Billy where he rode. "Have you ever seen the old quarry?" he asked. "They call it the lost quarry now because nobody seems to know where it is."

The old man went on: "I knew it well as a boy, but I am too old and crippled to go there and show you the way. Look for a small road to the left with deep ruts made by ox carts. Then when you come to Wolf Rock you will know you are on the right road."

Billy and Blaze Find the Way

Billy and Blaze are looking for adventure as they set out to explore the countryside. But when they find an abandoned quarry, they're in for more than they could have imagined. Not only does Billy perform a brave deed, but he and Blaze make a new friend, too! This could be the greatest adventure ever!

"Another book by C.W. Anderson that cannot fail to appeal to the young horse lover."—New York Times Book Review
